Miss Jane Donnely

My dear Miss Donnely and Miss Hyde

This letter is nearly four years late in being sent, for when I left Moscow in August 1927 I promised Mrs Derman I would write to both of you and send her greetings. I am chagrined to think I did not keep the promise.

When I was in Moscow again last winter I told Mrs Derman of my unkept promise and urged her to write to you direct. She has been separated from English speaking people for so long that she is unnecessarily timid about writing in the English language. Just before I left in May she gave me the enclosed letter to bring to you. I wanted to mail it direct from Moscow but she begged me to ^{keep it} correct it. Of course I have not done anything like that, since it does not need it. It is with much satisfaction that I send the letter on to you just as it is.

You are to be congratulated on having contributed Mrs Derman to the Russian library cause, for she is at present the most important person in Russia in the work of reorganization. She is necessarily obliged to take on more of the load than she should have since there are no other people in the entire country with the kind of training and experience she has had. I only wish they could send you a large quota of students each year. Perhaps that will come some time. In the meantime, I know you will be glad to hear from Mrs Derman. And be assured she will be most happy to receive a reply from you. She had her husband are most charming individuals to know.

Miss Hyde will I am sure remember that we knew each other when I was in the California State Library.

Yours sincerely

Harriet G. Eddy

(I am giving you also the Russian address, which you will not find difficult to inscribe. Although unnecessary, it is feasible to use as it insures the letter going direct to the person addressed, instead of having to wait for a translator)

An English typewriter can't talk Russian, as my stenographer thought.
So I've corrected it.
